

National centre for family and whānau violence research and information

Pānui | Newsletter - Issue 103 - June 2021

Kia ora!

Consultation on the national strategy and action plans to eliminate family and sexual violence comes to a close on Wednesday 30th of June. There is still time to have your say, you can find information about how to do this at <https://violencefree.govt.nz/have-your-say/>.

This month we are highlighting new research findings from the 2019 New Zealand Family Violence Study drawing attention to the impact of adverse childhood experiences (ACEs) on people's lives. In particular, the research shows that exposure to ACEs increases the likelihood that people will experience violence as adults.

Finally, it is Matariki, a time for learning and reflection and a time for remembering those who have passed.

We hope you are all keeping warm and safe,

Ngā mihi nui ki a koutou,

New research explores the impacts of adverse childhood experiences in New Zealand

A University of Auckland study explores the association between exposure to adverse childhood experiences and being subjected to violence in later life.

The research, published in the journal Child Abuse & Neglect, analysed the responses of nearly 2,900 people who took part in New Zealand's 2019 Family Violence Survey.
