

National centre for family and whānau violence research and information

Pānui | Newsletter - Issue 104 - July 2021

Kia ora!

We hope that you are keeping warm as we head into the final stretch of Winter in Aotearoa. There is plenty to be reading with a cup of tea by the fire, with further research being published from the 2019 New Zealand Family Violence Study, including two new articles exploring disabled people's experiences of violence. This is the first population-based prevalence research exploring experiences of intimate partner violence (IPV) among disabled people in Aotearoa New Zealand.

There is also new research focussed on engaging with boys and young men around ideas about masculinity, attitudes towards gender and equality and online behaviours. The research explores new ways of approaching prevention of sexual harassment, violence and abuse, as well as other forms of gendered violence and asks how we can support young men to become 'ethical people'.

There is plenty more research, news and events to keep you busy below.

New research shows that disabled people experience higher rates of violence

This is the first population-based prevalence research exploring experiences of intimate partner violence (IPV) among disabled people in Aotearoa New Zealand. The researchers also explored prevalence rates of non-partner violence among disabled people.

Researchers from the University of Auckland used data from the 2019 New Zealand Family Violence Survey, which surveyed more than 2800 women and men. The findings were published in two open access articles in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine.
